I would think they could start with ECHO and ENVIROFACTS, which they can get a list of the facilities that are permitted in the City, as well as enforcement information and environmental justice information... these two websites will give them much of what they are looking for...
I am not an expert on either one but there are people at EPA that could help them find what they are looking for in them...

Steve, do you know of a database that would have some of the fields that Houston wants to compile (see email below)?

Claudia,

Is your region's response program compiling any data like this? Houses near Superfund sites?

John

Subject: Registry/database of Environmental Health and Housing Info

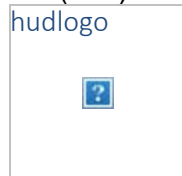

Importance: High

Hi John,

I called and left you a voice mail. My Name is Marcel and I am the Director of the Environmental Planning Division in the Office of Environment and Energy (OEE) here at HUD. I understand you are the HQ EPA UFR POC. I am touching base with you to find out if you know of the existence in the Harvey affected areas of a registry/database of environmental health and housing information local pollution/pollutant data, air quality data, housing data, water quality data, Superfund site data, services being received by housing address or occupant, etc. The City of Houston is contemplating developing such a database and my question for you is whether you are aware of such a database system (even if it doesn't have all the fields listed) having been created somewhere that can be used / purchased as is or as adaptable for this circumstance, so the City would not be starting from scratch. Please advise.

Thanks
